

Not Burroughs' final fix: materializing The Yage Letters

Consistent scrutiny

In the last decade of the twentieth-century it seemed to some that a breakthrough was taking place in the longstanding isolation of interpretive criticism and textual scholarship. It may be premature to speak "in retrospect," but it doesn't appear that the theoretical turn taken by textual scholars, combined with the trumpeted technological fix of hypertext editions, has really achieved disciplinary togetherness. Certainly, of the major players who are synonymous with the effort to postmodernise the field of editing theory—D. C. Greetham, Peter L. Shillingsburg, and Jerome J. McGann—only McGann has achieved genuine name-recognition outside the field itself, while the jury remains out on the creation of satisfactory "postmodern" editions, electronic or otherwise.

Within this general picture, the critical fate of William Burroughs—a figure paradoxically long central to postmodern culture and yet only lately brought in from the outer limits of the literary canon—may be especially illuminating. This is because Burroughs criticism has itself been highly paradoxical with respect to his literary history, in the sense that critics have not significantly researched the historical processes of textual production or reception, even though the production histories of Burroughs' books—or rather, certain potent genetic myths—have decisively shaped his books' popular and critical reception. That Burroughs was himself responsible for peddling these half-fictions about his fiction-making has not gone entirely unnoticed, especially concerning Naked Lunch,¹ but has itself been textualised as part of the writer's mystique. The upshot is that, as the Burroughs critical field expanded, more and more interpretive work—often very impressive on its own terms—has come to rest on the same small and unreliable scholarly base.

This kind of research has been central to my own work (see William Burroughs and the Secret of Fascination [2003]), but the credit for originally bringing Burroughs' writing within the framework of materialist criticism and textual theory must go to Carol Loranger, for a landmark essay that appeared in Postmodern Culture in 1999. Focused on Naked Lunch, Loranger's essay made two powerful calls: one for "consistent textual, as opposed to interpretive, scrutiny" of Burroughs' work; the other for a "postmodern edition" of his seminal novel, which would "necessarily be a hypertext edition" (24).

Loranger's second call raises important theoretical and practical issues without actually attempting to resolve them; as she puts it, her essay "should be taken as a series of first steps toward a postmodern edition of Naked Lunch" (2). The conclusion of this essay will return to these issues briefly in the context of both the new edition of Naked Lunch that actually did appear not long after ("The Restored Text" of 2003 by James Grauerholz and Barry Miles) and the "final steps" I have myself taken towards an edition of another work by Burroughs. The bulk of this essay details the materialist underpinnings to that edition, explored within a social text theoretical framework that "denies the automatic priority traditionally given to authors' intentions, preferring instead to regard textual creation and transmission as a collaborative, social act" (Greetham 9). In order to set up these explorations and to establish both their necessity and importance, I want first to subject to scrutiny Loranger's call for, and own practice of, textual scrutiny.

Focusing on the relation between the text of Naked Lunch in its various editions and its part-publication in the little magazine, Big Table, Loranger's case depends on two distinct claims. The first is by Burroughs himself, about "having no precise memory of writing" the text, a claim that underwrites Loranger's insistence that "authorial intent is antithetical to the very spirit of Naked Lunch" (2). She doesn't hold the author's claims to non-authorship up to any material scrutiny, however, because her stated aim is "not to contest" the "truth-value" of the text's genetic "mythology" (including "Burroughs's fabled passivity during the production of the novel" [5]), only to "specify its function" (7). She can therefore sidestep not just research into manuscript history but even use of the available biographical evidence (chiefly Burroughs' letters), either of which might have rescued at least some of the facts from behind the fable. Loranger's second claim is to be making comparative analysis of the actual texts, but, despite its interpretive strength, her account turns out to be inaccurate and incomplete even on its own terms. These failings bear down upon not only the practical rigor of her observations—and therefore the factual record on which interpretation is based—but, more broadly, on the descriptive opportunities opened up by social text theory.

In terms of descriptive rigour, both Loranger's observations about how little the "narrative portion" of Naked Lunch changed after the first edition—"the addition of two words" ("See Appendix") (5)—and her comparative analysis of this text with the "Ten Episodes" published in Big Table, are marred by material errors.ⁱⁱ In the most significant instances, she fails to observe that the Olympia edition lacks not "two words" but over two-and-a-half thousand,ⁱⁱⁱ while in "the market" section^{iv} it has a series of footnotes, the longest of which (over 800 words) runs across nine consecutive pages. Only about a quarter of this latter material, so visibly prominent in the first edition, ever became part of the narrative portion of Naked Lunch in later editions, the rest appearing in the "Appendix." This last section is not therefore, as Loranger claims, "an unrelated text, drawn into the orbit of Naked Lunch by the threat of obscenity charges" (in 1962, for the Grove edition). The significance of this point rests on the widely recognized effects of censorship in determining the appearance of Burroughs' work throughout the 1950s and '60s, and on the need for an accurate record of where, and by what agency, they occurred.^v

Finally, while Loranger cites approvingly Shillingsburg's "post-electronic affirmation of the radical non-equivalence of 'the work of art' with 'the linguistic text of it'" (1), her analysis all but passes over one of the most valuable aspects of social text theory;^{vi} namely attention not only to the text's words, its linguistic code, but to the materiality of bibliographic codes (physical features, from typeface to layout) and what George Bornstein calls "contextual coding" (the text's location within a larger whole).^{vii} In this light, we might consider both the possibility that such codes carried over from magazine to book publication, so affecting the production of Naked Lunch, and the hermeneutic significance of those codes for an analysis of the magazine versions as texts in their own right—texts whose social and cultural histories affected, indeed should be considered legitimate parts of, the reception of Burroughs' novel.

Recovering the original circumstances of publication is essential if Burroughs criticism is to undo what amounts to the repression of his oeuvre's richly complex textual history.^{viii} Equally, textual scholarship of this kind must become more rigorous because interpretive criticism inescapably depends upon it. Even in the most determinedly interpretive criticism, there is no "degree zero" of materiality, and the consequences of a false base can be dramatic.^{ix} One of the key reasons for remaining suspicious of the solutions promised by hypertext editions, therefore, is that editing also depends upon critical interpretation—is indeed itself an act of interpretation—so that what is most needed for both criticism and practical editing is an expanded material base informed by the rigorous scholarly application of the full descriptive potentials opened up by social text theory. That is to say, the theoretical model opens up descriptive potentials by bringing new material objects within the frame of analysis (physical features of the text, multiple states, etc.), so that scholars can then operationalize those potentials by carrying out rigorous descriptions as the basis to further critical interpretation.

In what follows, I take up these potentials for materialist criticism and editing in relation to The Yage Letters (1963), a text published four years after Naked Lunch, to which Loranger makes passing reference in her final paragraph. The fact that her comparison, in effect, once again inverts the true genetic relation between texts affirms, once again, that the value of this approach goes beyond analysis of individual works to embrace the intertextual relations between them. In the case of Burroughs, whose texts are a manifest bricolage of materials recycled across the oeuvre, such relations add up to a virtual limit-case, a nightmare of infinitely open-ended intertextuality. A complete analysis, in other words, lies far beyond the horizon of this essay.

Edited out

For forty years The Yage Letters has been one of the most popular texts in the Burroughs oeuvre, a short (18,000 word) and accessible introduction to his work. In the form of an epistolary narrative, the bulk of it documents Burroughs' seven month journey through the Amazonian jungles of Colombia, Ecuador, and Peru in 1953. This is the exotic backdrop for satirical bulletins and ethnobotanical observations in the course of his quest to find the fabled hallucinogen that gives the book its title (more correctly, written yagé, and pronounced "ya-hey"). The last quarter of the text comprises two further sections: "Seven Years Later," featuring Ginsberg's 1960 letter to Burroughs, which reported on his own experiences with the drug in the same region, and Burroughs' reply to Ginsberg; and "Epilogue," comprising a short letter by Ginsberg from 1963 followed by Burroughs' cut-up text, "I Am Dying, Meester?"

Despite its popularity, The Yage Letters' critical reception is almost as thin and short as the book itself. Jennie Skerl's thousand words in her 1985 study were the most detailed analysis until, in the last few years, two critics working outside the Burroughs field (Mullins in 2002, Martinez in 2003) advanced strong thematic readings in terms of sexuality and race. There are three, highly revelant, reasons why Burroughs critics have generally ignored The Yage Letters. Firstly, there's the peculiar hybridity of its overall contents, since it combines several completely different types of writing composed by two authors across two decades: the long first section, "In Search of Yage," ambiguously presented as authentic letters from Burroughs to Allen Ginsberg in 1953; a shorter exchange of letters between Ginsberg and Burroughs in 1960; and a third section comprising a brief letter by Ginsberg from 1963 and a cut-up text by Burroughs. It might be "typical" in principal, but in practice The Yage Letters does not resemble any other text in Burroughs' (or anyone else's) oeuvre.

Secondly, its place in Burroughs' literary history is paradoxically fluid: Mullins calls it his "third book" (64), presumably because "In Search of Yage" was written after Junkie and Queer. But in the chronology of publication, The Yage Letters (1963) followed Junkie (1953), Naked Lunch (1959), Minutes to Go (1960), The Soft Machine (1961), and The Ticket that Exploded (1962), and so becomes his sixth book. The Yage Letters thereby actually preceded the second book in Mullins' chronology, Queer (written in 1952 but not published until 1985), by over twenty years, by which time Burroughs' long-abandoned manuscript had been re-edited to include as an Epilogue material originally written to complete "In Search of Yage." The most visible of the resulting confusions between manuscript and publishing chronology concerns the phrase that is always quoted in any discussion of The Yage Letters: "Yage may be the final fix." These were the last words of Junkie (128),^x published in summer 1953 as Burroughs traveled through South America in search of yagé, and the inference seems obvious.^{xi} However, the line dates from July 1952, long before Burroughs thought of writing "Yage," and actually referred to Queer (which described his unsuccessful 1951 quest for the drug), although the line was not in that manuscript, as Campbell assumes (132). In fact, the line was only added to Junkie at the last minute because Ace Books, who were then considering publishing Queer as its sequel, wanted it there to link the two books. Whether or not the drug proved to be Burroughs' "final fix," the impact of such contingent circumstances suggests the urgent need to un-fix critical assumptions about the "final" text.

And thirdly, there's the indeterminate literary status of "In Search of Yage," three of whose "letters" are actually signed by Burroughs' fictional persona, William Lee. Immediately, the book's appearance therefore begs all sorts of textual issues, only complicated by the fact that the text has been twice revised (editions in 1975 and 1988 adding important new material to the first section, among other smaller changes). Features that seem to have deterred or confused interpretive criticism are, however, precisely those that make The Yage Letters ideally suited to a social text approach, both for editing practice and for materially-based textual reading.

In 1985 Skerl claimed that the "mode of composition (actual letters), the collaborative editing and publication, and the inclusion of later material" all made The Yage Letters "typical of Burroughs's practice as a writer": "He refuses to conform to the convention of the final text produced by the individual artist" (31). In broad terms, Skerl's incisive analysis still stands, and suggests the value of analysing The Yage Letters in the first place. A "socialized" approach, which views the text "as a collaborative, cultural force" and recognises "the work as having a career independent of the author" (Greetham 3, 55) is certainly consistent with Burroughs' authorship of (and in) The Yage Letters. On the other hand, the static notion of the "typical" text threatens to undo Skerl's own analysis by fixing and dehistoricizing the Burroughsian text. Whereas the specificity of its multiple historical identities and engagements is, to borrow Nicholas Frankel's terms, a sign of the text's "continual and ongoing subjection to the forces of historical change" (353)—including the production of new editorial transformations. In the case of The Yage Letters, these forces of change manifest a remarkably dynamic process of collaborative and contingent textual activity. This is not to say that the kind of specific textual-historical research undertaken here can or should be the basis for larger claims about materiality or agency. Rather, my aim is more local and limited because, as the shortcomings in this area of Burroughs criticism make clear, the necessity and importance of such research has primarily to do with the factual record and material base on which interpretation depends.

In common with earlier criticism, the recent approaches to "In Search of Yage" are based on silent material assumptions and on overlooking basic distinctions between the letter and literature. This is actually quite surprising, since both Greg Mullins and Manuel Luis Martinez make comparative use of Burroughs' published correspondence precisely to highlight differences between the texts of letters as they appear in "In Search of Yage" and in The Letters of William S. Burroughs, 1945-1959. In other words, their interest in local textual differences ignores the generic distinction between the texts they are citing—enabling Martinez, in one place, to refer to The Yage Letters while in fact quoting from The Letters (43). Biographers tend to assume the documentary value of literary works—and "In Search of Yage" has been readily used in this way—but in interpretive criticism of evident sophistication, it is odd to see such "transparent" readings of letters, however they are presented.

Although Skerl gave no detail to back it up, her implied skepticism—"the form of the narrative pretends to be strictly factual—a seemingly unrevised series of letters" (32)—ought to have suggested the need for interpretations either to build on manuscript research, or to avoid making the kind of specific claims that required it. This isn't the place to document the complex manuscript history of "In Search of Yage"—it's given in detail in the new edition itself—but suffice to say it reveals that the 1953 "letters" were, in almost all cases, fabricated in ways unimagined by Burroughs' critics. For in fact the most striking feature of the work by Mullins and Martinez is that they make direct and detailed claims not about the text's manuscript genealogy but about its editorial history. These claims are made without any supporting material context, and yet they are presented confidently as evidence to ground and support (in Mullins' case, otherwise illuminating and compelling) interpretation.

Interestingly, each critic is concerned to demonstrate that "In Search of Yage" was subject to deliberate acts of self-censorship that removed the same racially sensitive material from Burroughs' original letters, Mullins assuming that Burroughs "edited out" (77) this section because of its "offensiveness" (65), Martinez claiming that it was "edited for publication by Lawrence Ferlinghetti" (64), adding in a footnote: "The letters edited by Ferlinghetti were 'cleaned-up' for publication, omitting several passages which the publisher must have felt were racist or offensive. For example, Ferlinghetti strikes the frequent use of the word 'nigger,' substituting 'Nigra' or omitting the references altogether" (323). Whether aimed at author or editor, these are serious charges, and they raise highly relevant questions about censorship, but they also beg questions about authorship and agency and about the processes of textual production, transmission, and reception.

My aim in what follows is to settle the question of authorship (or perhaps more accurately, un-settle it), within the larger context of examining the text's full publishing history. Shifting the latter from the bibliographic margins to the interpretive centre shows the value of materialist criticism not just for resolving particular interpretive disputes (whodunnit? Burroughs or Ferlinghetti?), or even for generating new readings of the text, but for recognising new objects of critical analysis—objects useful for editors and critics alike.

If I focus on Burroughs' "In Search of Yage," deal with his later material more briefly, and pass over the Ginsberg texts, this is because the publishing history of this section is certainly the most richly complicated. Across the three editions published in 1963, 1975, and 1988, "In Search of Yage" exists in book form in three versions (see Table 1). But its prehistory also involves the appearance of its material published separately in four different little magazines (see Table 2).^{xii} And so, before describing how in 1963 Lawrence Ferlinghetti's City Lights came to publish this text within The Yage Letters as a whole, I first want to reconstruct the history of these magazine part-publications in order to recover their reception (their bibliographic, social and cultural histories) and then, more surprisingly, to reveal their active role in the production of Burroughs' "final" text (its multiple and divided material agencies).

The Little Magazine Lark^{xiii}

Burroughs' interest in magazines for the part-publication of his manuscripts goes back to his first novel, Junkie. Having completed a first draft called "Junk" in December 1950, by November of the following year he was sufficiently pessimistic about his chances of publishing the whole text as to be "ready to hack it up and peddle it to magazines" (Letters 95). Although Junkie was published in 1953—as a pulp paperback, hacked up in numerous places by its editors—

Burroughs made no progress with its planned sequel, "Queer." As for "Yage," Burroughs finished it in December 1953 (producing, with Ginsberg's help, a manuscript since lost), but started working on it again in 1955, by which time he was in Tangier, immersed in writing what became Naked Lunch and struggling ever more grimly with the commercial viability of his writing. When quoting one of its obscene "routines" in December 1954, he quips revealingly to Kerouac: "I can just see that serialized in Cosmopolitan or Good Housekeeping. I mean it's hopeless, Jack" (242). This, of course, was the point: Burroughs lacked a publishing context. That is why his comments about commercial magazines are so revealing. For, as his manuscripts got smaller—"Queer" and "Yage" combined were much shorter than "Junk"—and Burroughs found himself producing brief routines rather than coherent narrative, the magazine actually offered the most formally appropriate mode of publication.

The turning point in the history of Naked Lunch, which prompted Maurice Girodias at Olympia Press in Paris to accept the whole in June 1959, was the publication of the Big Table "Episodes" studied by Loranger—or rather, the non-publication of parts of this material in the issue of Chicago Review infamously banned by the university authorities, which in turn led to the creation of Big Table as a way to get the material into print. Burroughs himself summed up the immediate and longer-term significance of this chain of events: "So it was publication in a little magazine that led to the publication of Naked Lunch at a time when I had almost given up. For many years I sent out pieces to all little magazines that asked me for a contribution" (Maynard and Miles x). Actually, Burroughs' use of little magazines after Naked Lunch was more than just an act of grateful payback; in important ways it was materially related to his cut-up practices, the kinds of text they produced, and the kind of reception they sought.^{xiv} But the larger point is again one of context: by the 1960s there was a great counter-cultural world of little magazines, not integrated into either commercial or academic institutions, of a kind that barely existed in the previous decade. Burroughs' closest Beat friends, Ginsberg and Kerouac, were also aware of the new opportunities, and of how they promised to renew the magazine culture of prewar modernism—hence, Kerouac's comment in late 1959 where he references Marianne Moore's famous avant-garde magazine of the 1920s to predict the future for three of the new outlets, Kulchur, Yugen and Beatitude; "all those lil things will grow into big DIALS in time" (Selected Letters 219).

Of course, the general picture needs some specificity, since the category "Little Magazine" conceals important differences in content, format, readership, and so on, and Burroughs' involvement was with four quite different magazines: Black Mountain Review, Big Table, Kulchur and The Floating Bear. As well as their particular social and cultural histories, each of these magazines presented Burroughs' material in distinct bibliographic environments, inviting us to consider both how these part-texts were received in their original publishing contexts, and how this relates to the reception (and indeed, production) of The Yage Letters.

Black Mountain Review

While its circulation remained very small ("a usual printing of some 500 to 750 copies, about 200 of which ever got distributed," according to its editor, the poet Robert Creeley [261]), Black Mountain Review was highly influential culturally both on its own terms and for the new magazines its example inspired. For Creeley, the point of BMR was that it was not The Kenyon Review—not, that is, another forum for the academic literary establishment, any more than Black Mountain College was another orthodox educational institution. Although it was never a Beat magazine, BMR lasted long enough to publish its "epochal final issue" (Watson 225) of Autumn 1957 (actually issued in Spring 1958), co-edited by Allen Ginsberg and featuring an impressive Beat lineup, which included texts by Ginsberg, Kerouac, Michael McClure, Gary Snyder, Philip Whalen, and a certain "William Lee."

The Beat context for Burroughs' text in BMR—the letter dated "July 10, 1953"—actually signaled a double publishing breakthrough: as Ted Morgan notes, it was "a crucial break in the pattern of rejection" for Burroughs, and the first gathering of the major Beat writers in print, evidence "that the Beats were now a bona fide movement" (287). On the other hand, the cultural importance that is clear in historical retrospect contrasts strikingly with the obscurity, to all but a very few readers, of this particular text at the time.

For nothing here identified the "Lee" whose name appeared on the contents page and at the end of the letter as William Burroughs, nor for that matter identified the "Allen" to whom it is addressed as Allen Ginsberg.^{xv} The title—"from Naked Lunch, Book III: In Search of Yage"—would surely have been just as mystifying then as it is now, albeit for different reasons. For here, contrary to all appearances, "Naked Lunch" does not in fact refer to the Naked Lunch that would be published in 1959, but to a tripartite work comprising "Junk," "Queer," and "Yage" that, during the mid-1950s, Burroughs grouped under that title: in other words, the heading in BMR actually identifies this text as part of "In Search of Yage." But the most obscure aspect of the text's presentation for the magazine's readers is the most obvious: the letter appears on its own without any larger narrative context to make sense of it. Then again, after the opening lines, the text's presentation as a letter is easy to forget, since the majority of it does not give the appearance of being part of any sort of epistolary narrative. It reads like an entirely self-contained text, and when it ends abruptly without any signing off, the name "William Lee" at the foot of the page (set in distinctive bold type) seems to identify an author, not a letter-writer.

As for the particular contents of the "July 10, 1953" letter—the vision of the "Composite City"—this requires the most detailed analysis since it is by far the most widely referenced part of the The Yage Letters. One of Burroughs' most extraordinary pieces of writing, stylistically close to the densely poetic collage cartographies of Rimbaud and St. John Perse—both major influences on Burroughs—it begins by declaring that "Yage is space time travel" and ends prophetically announcing the intersection of "the unknown past and the emergent future" (YL 44, 46). While its striking thematic of physical and chronological transcendence is clear, the full significance of this text depends on recognising the multiple material analogues of its theme generated by its equally striking bibliographical chronology. These analogues are of two kinds: firstly, the text's publishing history, and secondly its intertextual relations as a part of The Yage Letters.

To begin with, the "July 10, 1953" letter was the first published part of Burroughs' "Yage" manuscript, but it is also the final letter in the whole epistolary sequence. Picking up BMR number 7, the first readers of "In Search of Yage" literally began at the end. However, the text goes on to perform an even more paradoxical inversion of chronology, since in 1963 the first readers of The Yage Letters were presented with another ending (the "July 8" letter) and would not find this letter in there; nor would they for another twelve years, when it was at last included in the second edition. Bizarrely, then, the first letter of "In Search of Yage" to be published (in BMR) was also the last letter to be published in "In Search of Yage" (in The Yage Letters). On the other hand, sixteen years earlier, readers of Naked Lunch would have come across it in 1959, since the letter, minus only the first four lines and with a few minor differences, appeared there at the start of "the market" section. The peculiarity of this complex bibliographical chronology in turn accounts for the genetic confusion in Loranger's analysis. She inverts the true relation between texts because, far from the later-published Yage Letters

"reworking material from the narrative portion of Naked Lunch" (24), it was Naked Lunch that had assimilated the overlapping material—the "July 10, 1953" letter^{xvi}—first published separately in BMR but ultimately taken from the "Yage" manuscript. If yagé, the drug, "is space time travel," and if "space time travel" became "the hallmark of Naked Lunch and his subsequent cut-up novels" (Mullins 65), then so, through its various material manifestations, is the very text that said so.

This analogy between theme and material history is remarkable, but it is also accidental, a byproduct of contingent circumstances. The question of agency is crucial here, suggesting that the phrasing Skerl used to describe The Yage Letters as a whole—"Burroughs refuses to conform to the convention of the final text produced by the individual artist"—has to be revised in two directions: to downplay the assumption of authorial motivation (in paradoxically determining the refusal of authorial control), and to play up the material agency of the text (in determining the refusal of textual finality).

What then, of the other—intertextual—analogue of this text's thematics? Perhaps unsurprisingly, it also begs questions of agency and operates in two chronological directions at once. The first set of intertextual relations becomes visible only when the "July 10, 1953" letter is read retrospectively as the final part of "In Search of Yage." In this context, the text describing the "Composite City" and "space time travel" now appears, materially, as itself a composite text that travels through textual space and time. This is because its collage aesthetic renders the yagé experience of visionary possession by being based on the wholesale recycling and transformation of phrases already read in the earlier letters, so generating cumulatively an uncanny sense of déjà-vu.^{xvii} In terms of the book's spatial and temporal existence, it is therefore fitting that this text should generate intertextual relations not just backwards in space and time but also forward.

For within The Yage Letters as a whole the Composite City vision that concludes "In Search of Yage" finds an exact parallel in the text that concludes the whole book, "I Am Dying, Meester?" Although she gives no detail and overlooks the parallel, Skerl rightly observes that this text "employs the cut-up technique to create a collage from the materials in the earlier letters" (31). In fact, nearly a quarter of its 660 words derive from "In Search of Yage," mainly from the "January 15" and "April 15" letters, although it is very difficult to be precise, given not only the nature of the cut-up method but the extent of this text's internal repetition (nearly half the first paragraph, for example, occurs scattered about in later paragraphs). Such features are secondary, however, to the text's visible foregrounding of its material procedures. For the immediate physical appearance of textual fragments, bridged by over seventy dashes in a piece less than 700 words long, forces the sign to point to itself and to its origins in other texts. This is apparent even before reading, which marks the obvious difference between this text and the "July 10" letter, whose act of recycling can only be recognised in retrospect, after reading the whole narrative. The cut-up text radicalizes this process by insistently calling into question the agency and integrity of authorship and language, not only with respect to itself, but retrospectively to all the preceding texts—to all the letters, franked with dates and signatures as signs of authenticity—that it has mixed and sampled.^{xviii}

The very placement of the "July 10, 1953" letter and "I Am Dying, Meester?" in The Yage Letters invites the reader to see Burroughs' cut-up technique as a systematic development of the earlier, yagé-inspired, bricolage text, and so recognise cut-up as the textuality of yagé experience. It would then be possible to explore the relations between the hybrid material textuality of this letter and its thematics of cultural hybridity, and so recognize the relation between Burroughs' emerging experimental aesthetic and his background in ethnology and anthropology. We might therefore read the Composite City, and its avatars in Naked Lunch and the cut-up trilogy, as a postmodern topographic mapping in the tradition of Surrealist ethnography, likewise based on a collage aesthetic of juxtaposition that foregrounds "cuts and sutures" rather than presenting fixed wholes (Clifford 146).

However, the placement of these two texts first makes its invitation only to the reader of the revised edition of The Yage Letters in 1975, because, in a twist of chronology and causality noted before, the "July 10, 1953" letter wasn't included until a dozen years after "I Am Dying, Meester?" Or to put this bizarre inversion of chronology and causality another way, the text that was the earliest aesthetic precursor of Burroughs' cut-up technique (by a decade) only took up its place in The Yage Letters a decade after the cut-up text whose recycling deliberately paralleled it. This in turns accounts for the significant—and otherwise surprising—absence from the cut-up text of any phrases derived from the "July 10, 1953" letter, since Burroughs cut up only those letters that appeared in the first edition.^{xix}

The bibliographic and intertextual time travel that began with Black Mountain Review might also go still further—to analyse, for example, the version of the Composite City that appears in Naked Lunch—but the central point remains the remarkable multiplication of its relations and meanings in comparison to its original magazine publication. How ironic, that this specific letter—which not only concluded "In Search of Yage" but was partly made from recycling its materials—should have been published first and without any context so that it appeared entirely self-contained. Then again, that is precisely why Ginsberg—acting on Kerouac's recommendation in September 1956^{xx}—chose it from among Burroughs' other manuscripts for Creeley's magazine.

Big Table

The history of Burroughs' involvement with Big Table has become familiar, but only in terms of its publication of the Naked Lunch "Episodes." The entirely untold story of its relation to The Yage Letters is, however, of equal significance for the relation between magazine and book publications.

After the suppression of The Chicago Review, the inception of the new magazine was, as Peter Michelson observed, "a stunning counterattack" against the academy that in turn "helped give shape to the Beat and Black Mountain 'revolution' in poetics" (350, 353). The "Chicago Review-cum-Big Table war" was therefore a decisive cultural moment, showing how the Beats "even turned apparent tactical defeats into strategic victory" (346). Big Table was also exemplary of the "kamikaze" little magazine that realized a specific function and then simply folded (after five issues). As Peter Martin notes, "it began as a controversial magazine, publishing suppressed material, but did not shift its emphasis or settle into a less incendiary editorial policy" (683). Burroughs' praise was certainly emphatic, from the time he saw the Spring 1958 issue of Chicago Review, and told its editor, Irving Rosenthal, that it was "way ahead of these dead, academic periodicals like Partisan Review and Hudson Review" and to be compared only with BMR,^{xxi} to his telling editor Paul Carroll in November 1959 that "Big Table is the best in the field."^{xxii}

Controversy was essential to Big Table's existence, and it is important to recall, as Martin does, that the first issue "was itself banned in March 1959, and more than four hundred copies were impounded by the Post Office" (683). In a lawsuit supported by the ACLU, on July 5, judge Julius J Hoffman ruled that the ban declaring Big Table "non-mailable" was null and void, and this second attempt at censorship ironically ensured the new magazine's celebrity and the sale of its 10,000 print run. It also significantly established the publishing context for the letters presented under the title "In Quest of Yage." That is to say, the specific epistolary character of Burroughs' text took on potential meaning insofar as it appeared in a magazine not only created from and then subject to earlier acts of censorship involving publication of his fiction, but specifically in relation to censorship of this material distributed through the mail.

The reception of "In Quest of Yage" in Big Table is determined by its immediate bibliographical context in unique ways. For, in contrast to the material's presentation in other magazines or in The Yage Letters, here it is packaged with introductory texts by other authors, Paul Bowles and Alan Ansen, and even photographs of Burroughs by Ginsberg. Although Bowles' essay, entitled "Burroughs in Tangier," makes no direct reference to the letters,^{xxiii} he does introduce them by way of a memorable personal portrait of Burroughs that must have had some bearing on the text's reception. Ansen's essay, however, is the more precisely determining and significant. The first issue of Big Table had trailed the appearance of his "critical and biographical study" (2), and this substantial essay—over a third the length of "In Quest of Yage"—duly appears, before the Bowles piece. What makes Ansen's essay so interesting is that it gives a compelling account of Burroughs' career based on first-hand knowledge, but sets up for the reader a whole series of specific expectations about the letters that are—emphatically—not met. For example, according to Ansen, the letters describe Panama, introduce the character Allerton, and feature five "routines" ("Friendly Finance," "Billy Bradshinkel," "Roosevelt after Inauguration," "the Zen Routine," and the "most ambitious routine of all [...] a vision of 'The Composite City" [40]). Since there is no account of Panama, no Allerton, and not one routine in "In Quest of Yage," the reader could only be left baffled, as if Ansen had described a different text altogether. The short explanation for the confusion is that nothing in Big Table clarifies for the reader that the six letters published here are actually part of a larger whole. But the view in retrospect—for readers of The Yage Letters—is, if anything, even more confusing, since the "whole" publication would still not match the text Ansen describes. It is just as well that Ferlinghetti did not take up Ginsberg's suggestion to use Ansen's essay—since it "describes the letters"—as an appendix for the City Lights edition.^{xxiv} However, the mismatch in Big Table does provide invaluable insights for critics into the fluid state of Burroughs' manuscripts, since the reference to Allerton establishes the surprising overlap between "Yage" and "Queer" in the mid-1950s, while the inclusion of the "Friendly Finance" routine confirms that the "Epilogue" added to Queer in 1985 (where the routine appears) originally belonged to "Yage." Another "In Search of Yage" becomes suddenly visible, one entirely different-looking to the version eventually published.

Finally, what of the text made by the letters themselves? Since "In Quest of Yage" comprises the fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, tenth and eleventh letters in the whole sequence of "In Search of Yage," the reader inevitably confronts gaps in the narrative chronology. Thus the first letter—"February 28, 1953"—begins with Burroughs on his "way back to Bogota" (44), even though we've not seen him go there in the first place. Likewise, Doc Schindler is mentioned in the "March 3" letter, as if we had already been introduced to him (which happens in the second letter of "In Search of Yage"). On the other hand, the final letter, "July 8," makes similar references to "the Naval Lieutenant" and "the furniture salesman" (62, 62)—and these are never explained in the whole sequence either. In other words, the very fact of epistolary presentation makes it easy to naturalize such gaps or slips as generic textual features, even to interpret them as signs of authenticity.

This appearance is aided by text's presentation here—by "William S. Burroughs"—and it is noticeable that all the letters are signed "William" or "Bill"—none "Lee"—so avoiding (very likely deliberately) the contradictory signals about literary authorship and epistolary authenticity given in "In Search of Yage" within The Yage Letters.

Kulchur

Where Black Mountain Review was the poetry magazine of an experimental College in North Carolina, and Big Table had emerged as an alternative to the censored press run by the University of Chicago, Kulchur, under the financial patronage of Lita Horlick, was formed in 1960 as "a determinedly New York publication" (Burns 41), with an intellectual outlook of "high seriousness and wide-ranging interest" that included the Beats (Clay and Phillips 85). For Gilbert Sorrentino, "Kulchur most definitely reflected the close of a literary era that had begun in about 1950 and found its first voice in Black Mountain Review," and (echoing Kerouac's prediction) in his estimation it "must be considered one of the great magazines of the twentieth century, an authoritative voice, as important as The Little Review, The Dial, transition" (315, 311).

Predictably then, in issue number 3, Burroughs' "In Search of Yage" appeared in familiar company, alongside poems by Ginsberg and Olson, and texts by Kerouac and Bowles. And, as with Big Table, Burroughs' text also appeared here in the context of his own work's previous appearance in an earlier issue. In fact, the intertextual relations in Kulchur are far more significant, since the text that appeared in number 1—"The Conspiracy"—was Burroughs' unique, explicit fictional development of his interest in yagé, here described as an elixir of creative power and weapon of political resistance. Ironically, this would have set the Kulchur reader up to be disappointed, since the five letters presented here make almost no reference to yagé, let alone its vital role in global conspiracies.

The letters in Kulchur are directly introduced by a short editorial note that acknowledges their relation to "others, already published—BIG TABLE 2," claiming that, together, "they constitute a collection that will one day appear as a book, under the title 'In Search of Yage'" (7). Of course, when that "one day" came, the book that appeared would not bear this title, since by then "In Search of Yage" had itself become precisely one part in a larger whole. However, the note at least explains the otherwise perplexing gap in the chronology of the letters—after three long letters, all dated within two weeks of each other, the sequence cuts from January 30 to May 12 and from Pasto to Lima, with no journey in between—a gap, this time, too large to naturalise.

In the structure of "In Search of Yage" published in The Yage Letters, the letters here are the first, second, third, eighth and ninth. So, putting the selections from Big Table and Kulchur together, a reader would now be able to interleave the two separate blocks of text used in each magazine to at last construct the proper sequence. Or they would be able to, if a footnote to the last letter, "May 23" (1953), didn't direct the reader on to yet another text in yet another magazine: "'The Routine' appears in The Floating Bear (#9), distributed solely by mailing list" (18). Adding to the bibliographical confusion, the routine referred to in the letter—"Roosevelt after Inauguration"—appeared in The Floating Bear four issues after that magazine had already published another element soon to appear in The Yage Letters (Burroughs' letter of "June 21 1960"), written some seven years after the routine; yet again, the publishing history of the text contrives to scramble the chronology of its parts.

The Floating Bear

Although its contents and readership partly overlapped those of quarterlies like Kulchur, The Floating Bear, at first distributed semi-monthly, was an altogether different type of magazine. Edited by Diane di Prima and Leroi Jones, and published out of a West Village bookshop's back storeroom, the Bear was a key player in the avant-garde "mimeograph revolution" of the early 1960s because of, rather than despite, its very low production values and underground circulation. Peter Martin describes one reason for its importance: "The subtitle 'A Newsletter' is the key to The Floating Bear's chief contribution to literature of the 1960s; it was a newsletter, a speedy line of communication between experimental poets" (699). Di Prima elaborates on this aspect, noting that it "was like writing a letter to a bunch of friends" and that she and Jones had a common "sense of urgency of getting the technological advances of, say, Olson, into the hands of, say, Creeley, within two weeks, back and forth" (x-xi). Her comments give rise to two ironies, the first of which is that, performing a broadly similar function, Black Mountain Review had actually "developed from the friendship in daily correspondence between Creeley and Black Mountain Rector Charles Olson" (Clay and Phillips 107)—which made all the more appropriate their magazine's publication of Burroughs' "July 10, 1953" letter. The second irony concerns the material appearance in Floating Bear of the two Burroughs texts that would later appear in The Yage Letters.

To begin with, the reader of Burroughs' "June 21 1960" letter in Bear number 5 (April 1961) would not have been able to identify the "Allen" to whom it is addressed as Ginsberg. More importantly, nor would they have been able to reconstruct, or even imagine, the biographical epistolary context that gave rise to Burroughs' letter, since nothing in it clarifies that Ginsberg had urgently asked him for advice about his own yagé experiences. Contrary to the magazine's aim of reciprocation, here the reader is given only one half of an exchange of letters—indeed, is presented with the reply, without knowing what prompted it (and needing to wait two-and-a-half years to find out). The result is that Burroughs' already enigmatic letter—a cryptically written prescription for Ginsberg to use his new cut-up method as "Help"—appears more mysterious still.

The bibliographical environment does, however, produce a direct context for Burroughs' letter.^{xxv} For it is immediately preceded by "OUT SHOW WINDOW AND WE'RE PROUD OF IT." Although there is no acknowledgement, this short cut-up text is almost exactly the same as "FROM SAN DIEGO UP TO MAINE" that had appeared in Minutes to Go (1960)—the launching manifesto of the cut-up method, to which Burroughs' letter actually directs Ginsberg. In other words, Floating Bear expanded on Burroughs' letter by juxtaposing it with a specific and presumably relevant example of his cut-up practice. On the other hand, while the text illustrates and so helps disseminate what Di Prima called "technological advances" in literary technique, it does absolutely nothing to clarify the therapeutic function cryptically claimed in the letter.

The same can be said of The Yage Letters, where Burroughs' 1960 letter is followed by his cut-up text, "I Am Dying, Meester?" and where, once again, any demonstration of the method's therapeutic function remains obscure. However, while a direct relation between Burroughs' letter and "I Am Dying, Meester?" appears self-evident, in fact the invitation to read the second text in light of the first is the product of entirely contingent publication circumstances. For the chronological sequence that places Burroughs' 1963 cut-up text after his 1960 letter actually inverts the chronology of these elements' inclusion in The Yage Letters: that's to say, Burroughs' decision to include "I Am Dying, Meester?" turns out to have preceded by some sixth months the plan to include his 1960 letter. The addition of this earlier material therefore disguised and usurped the original intention, in which the cut-up text followed sequentially and logically immediately after "In Search of Yage."

Finally, the material features of the text as it appears in Floating Bear are of particular importance. Ben Lee argues that the "willfully haphazard production" of the newsletter resulted in an improvisatory "slapdash aesthetic" that was "meant to mirror the sort of 'open form' its contributors favored in poetry and prose" (379, 375, 374). The mimeo format was certainly essential, not only for producing the magazine at high speed and low cost, but also for determining the physical appearance of the text on the page. Indeed, Di Prima was specifically conscious of this point in relation to the Bear's use of 8 1/2 x 11 paper and standard typewriter font: "Almost everybody writes on typewriters, and I felt that a lot of what they were doing had to do with the shape of their page" (xi). The impact for Burroughs' letter is striking, giving an appearance of authenticity that is entirely appropriate since, at first sight, the letter printed in the Bear appears to be an exact facsimile of his original manuscript, down to his use of sections in block capitals and unusual layout. On closer inspection, it proves not to be, and the autograph signature reproduced here isn't in Burroughs' distinctive hand. This is entirely appropriate, given the letter's cut-up critique of authorship ("My Voice. Whose Voice?") and the fact that the signature is not actually for Burroughs' own name but for that of his spiritual patron, "Hassan Sabbah" (Yage Letters 59, 61). Nevertheless, it is a nice irony that by far the cheapest of the little magazines should have been the only one to approximate the material form of Burroughs' letters, and that this particular letter should have been the only one to make decisive use of formal features.

As for the appearance of "Routine: Roosevelt after Inauguration" in Bear number 9, no contemporary reader would likely have made any connection with the texts published in number 5. Although it is undated, readers familiar with Burroughs' new cut-up methods would surely have recognised it as writing from the previous decade. Then again, there's no obvious internal evidence for any connection to his various "Yage" publications, and it appears a self-contained and free-standing satire. Ironically enough, this, the first part of the "Yage" manuscript to be completed (in May 1953), would be the very last part to be included in "In Search of Yage," only appearing in the third edition, twenty-five years after the first. The reason for this delay was censorship exercised by the British printers in 1963, itself the renewal of an earlier act of censorship on the routine's appearance in Floating Bear. Fittingly, this act had inserted the routine (back) into an epistolary context, since the censorship was directed against the magazine's (free) distribution to its mailing list. It came about when a copy sent to one man on the list, who was in a New Jersey prison, was itself intercepted by the censor. In October 1961, Di Prima and Jones were arrested for using the mail to disseminate obscene materials and, although cleared, their confrontation with the forces of censorship was certainly noted by Lawrence Ferlinghetti.^{xxvi}

City Lights

A good deal more could be said about City Lights than space here allows, but two facts stand out. Firstly, its unique position as an independent publisher set up in the mid-1950s that was closely aligned with the emerging alternative poetry magazine culture, and that led Ferlinghetti to fight the same battles against censorship (he supported Big Table, for example, and had famously gone to court over his publication of Ginsberg's Howl and Other Poems in 1957). In other words, the cultural identity and social meaning of The Yage Letters was decisively shaped by its publication as a City Lights paperback. Secondly, its ideal status as a publisher of Burroughs' "Yage" material is evidenced by the dialogue conducted throughout the mid-1950s and early '60s between Ginsberg and Ferlinghetti concerning the destiny of Burroughs' manuscripts. Although, in September 1953, Ginsberg had initially contacted Malcolm Cowley at Viking about "Yage," he would soon begin to exert what he referred to as "golden pressure" on Ferlinghetti,^{xxvii} driven by his belief that the expatriate Burroughs needed to be published not just in an American context but in one specifically determined as Beat. Ferlinghetti, for his part, resisted Ginsberg's lobbying, not only turning down the chance to publish the material in the banned issue of The Chicago Review simply because it had been censored—unlike Maurice Girodias, he was no opportunist—but also resisting for almost six years Ginsberg's repeated suggestion he publish "Yage."

Burroughs had returned from South America in September 1953 and moved into Ginsberg's East 7th Street apartment, where they worked together on his "Yage" and "Queer" manuscripts. So far as "Yage" was concerned, Ginsberg knew that no one "in the publishing business in N. Y. will find it an acceptable commodity."^{xxviii} From the outset, then, Ginsberg expected censorship problems, and a decade later he even anticipated self-censorship by Burroughs in the run-up to the City Lights publication, asking Ferlinghetti: "Are you sure Burroughs Yage mss. is same as was published in Kulchur & Float bear & Big Table? Hope he hasn't edited too much."^{xxix} Ginsberg's anxiety was misplaced—and for a reason that reveals something fundamental about the editing history of The Yage Letters. The fact is that Ferlinghetti never saw an original manuscript, because Burroughs no longer had one; instead, he simply collected into a whole those parts that were in print. As the internal evidence (of transcription errors carried over) suggests, and as the City Lights editorial files at Berkeley prove, "In Search of Yage" was materially based on those texts already published in the little magazines,^{xxx} and these were accepted by all concerned to define the complete text.^{xxxi}

Now at last we can settle the question of agency and authorship with respect of the material that did (and did not) appear in The Yage Letters, by answering the whodunnit question posed by the censorship claims made by Mullins and Martinez. The short answer is that both of them are wrong, because neither Burroughs nor Ferlinghetti "edited out" anything. Martinez's claim that Ferlinghetti "cleaned-up" Burroughs' "original letters" "for publication" is based on two false assumptions: firstly, that the publisher was dealing with the manuscripts of Burroughs' real correspondence (as later published in The Letters), which is contradicted by the fact that his "Yage" manuscript was entirely separate (and mostly not even based on real letters); and secondly, that Ferlinghetti worked on any Burroughs manuscript at all, whereas actually, apart from the two Ginsberg letters, everything in The Yage Letters derived directly from earlier magazine publications. If any censorship had affected "In Search of Yage," it would have been the responsibility of Creeley, Carroll, or Horlick. In fact, the racially "offensive" passage probably was in the lost "Yage" manuscript Burroughs completed in December 1953; but if so, it was contained in a separate, fabricated letter (dated "June 23/28," Pucallpa) that wasn't available to Ferlinghetti precisely because this (and one other, dated "July 20," Mexico)^{xxxii} had not previously been offered for magazine publication. Rather than a deliberate act of last-minute editing, what took place was a prolonged, messy process of piecemeal manuscript cannibalisation, an operation conducted long-distance, from first Tangier and then Paris, always mediated by Ginsberg, and shaped decisively by other publishing contingencies in North Carolina, Chicago, New York and San Francisco.

To a striking degree, the City Lights publication was determined by multiple and divided agencies and by contingent factors, affecting not just "In Search of Yage" but both the other two sections. Thus, it turns out that Burroughs' "June 21 1960" letter was only included on the suggestion of Ginsberg, six months before publication, and he only suggested it because Ferlinghetti had just then (by "a real stroke of luck")^{xxxiii} stumbled across, via a third party, Ginsberg's "June 10

1960" letter, to which Burroughs' letter was the reply. In other words, Ginsberg's efforts to get "In Search of Yage" published brought about the creation of an entirely new section of 1960 letters written by both men but never intended for the book. What's more, since the decision to include "Seven Years Later" was actually taken six months after Burroughs had decided to include "I Am Dying, Meester?" this second section created by Ginsberg and Ferlinghetti displaced the text Burroughs had written specifically to follow and conclude "In Search of Yage." Ending up in a third section, "Epilogue," his cut-up text now seemed to relate more to the new second section than the first. Paradoxically, the book that Ginsberg had been promoting on Burroughs' behalf was itself radically transformed by his efforts, extending still further the intertextual relations, disturbances in bibliographical chronology, and composite agency that characterized the original.

Burroughs approved the addition of the two 1960 letters, or perhaps simply acquiesced. He did not entirely surrender authorial control to Ginsberg and Ferlinghetti, however, overruling both of them when each had expressed doubts about the inclusion of "I Am Dying, Meester?" as the final text. And yet, even here, Burroughs had the last word in the book only in the most paradoxical fashion. After the cut-up text, there appears his name - but only because John Sankey, Ferlinghetti's London printer, suggested it should be there, since otherwise the "reader cannot see if this is by Ginsberg or Burroughs."^{xxxiv} The very name of the author thus reflects the determinism of a social agency.

In the "Roosevelt" routine—a text only admitted into The Yage Letters in 1988 after a contingent publishing career determined by acts of censorship—there's a passage where Burroughs fantasizes the post of Congressional Librarian being awarded to a "transvestite lizzie" who "barred the male sex from the premises" so that "a world-famous professor of philology suffered a broken jaw at the hands of a bull dyke when he attempted to enter the Library" (36). Given Burroughs' own experience of being barred from fulfillment by those institutions regulating sexuality and literature, this vision of aggressive hybrid creatures taking over the academy and roughing up the venerable authority of philology seems strangely prophetic.

Naked Lunch Restored

In a comprehensive critical review of D. C. Greetham's attempt to postmodernize editing theory, Paul Eggert contests his verdict in Theories of the Text that we now live in "post-philological days," arguing that "the moment of editorial theory is over" (331). Then again, Greetham had himself questioned the value of McGann's influential theory of social text editing ("I am by no means sure I understand exactly what is a socialized text" [406]), expressing the central doubt about the practical value of theory with which Thomas Tanselle began his millennial review of textual criticism, noting how "a focus on texts as social products came to characterize the bulk of discussion of textual theory, if not editions themselves" (1; my emphasis). "What we need now" is not more theory, Eggert concludes, but "the practical responses: the reports from the editorial trenches" (332).

Before concluding my own "report" from the front-line of Burroughs editing, what of the "Restored" Naked Lunch as a response to Loranger's call for a postmodern, hypertext edition? Although it has many other merits, the edition produced by Grauerholz and Miles overlooks the value of her analysis for presenting, if not an interactive hypertext, then at least a text that (to cite the quotation in her title) "spill off the page in all directions." Most simply, it does this by providing a contents page that locates each of the book's many sections. Since one of the most distinctive features of Naked Lunch is the extraordinary difficulty every reader experiences of finding their way around it, the effect—to stop the words spilling off the page—is, in Loranger's terms, "a grave editorial sin" (23).

More substantially, the "Restored" edition falls short in at least two theoretical and practical respects. Firstly, as Eggert notes, even "if there is no stoutly defensible philosophical grounding for editing," practice can at least "be self-consciously aware that its operations are necessarily contextualised by the present" (331). The "Restored" Naked Lunch misses this opportunity by failing to describe or reflect on its own workings, either in terms of theoretical models or practical detail. Thus in their "Editors' Note," Grauerholz and Miles observe—unlike Loranger—that the texts of the 1959 Olympia and 1962 Grove Naked Lunch "are quite different" (234), but since they give no further clarifying details, it's impossible to know how, or even whether, their editing practice was informed by a comparative descriptive analysis. Likewise, while both editors are well aware of the complex, contingent circumstances of the text's production and publication, they do not position their work with respect to the old and new "grails" of editing theory—put reductively; the single, intentional, originating authorial genius and the socially collaborative multitude of equally valid contributing agents. One, especially fitting, example should illustrate.

In the "Editors' Note," the author's "authority" is called upon to approve the removal of certain duplicate passages: "Miles once asked Burroughs if the repeated passages in the book were all intentional; Burroughs replied that they were there by mistake, caused by the rush to get the text to Girodias" (245). It might seem that the issue here is whether the editors should have chosen, as a matter of principal, a social rather than authorial model of agency, and let the repetitions stand. But it is also a question of which "repetition" should be cut, and in "the market" section they remove the passage beginning "The room seems to shake and vibrate with motion" from what was its first appearance in the text. This material at the start of the section, however, reproduces the "July 10, 1953" letter as published in Black Mountain Review (minus its opening lines and with other minor differences). By deleting the passage in this context, rather than when it reappeared a few lines after the end of this material, the editors therefore overlooked the longstanding integrity of the "Composite City" text as it had existed in its manuscript, magazine, and book publishing histories. In short, the descriptive potentials of a socialized approach could have better guided the editors' decisions, even if they were framed by a traditional theory of final authorial intentions.

The Yage Letters Redux

I have already argued that The Yage Letters is suited to a socialized approach because of the text's bibliographical variability—both its external multiplicity (as Stillinger would term it) and also (adapting Bakhtin) its internal multiplicity—and because of the strong material parallels between its thematic and formal hybridity. In describing the publishing history of its various parts, I have made it possible to recognize the ways in which The Yage Letters, in the very act of "restoring" these part-texts to their proper chronological place in the whole, also removed them from their social embedding and material histories. Those several histories in turn clarify that this "whole" was no more than the retrospective sum of the parts.

In order to suggest the implications for editing of these acts of historical repression and recovery, I want to focus on perhaps the smallest possible concrete instance, one with minimal semantic value. In the text certain letters use a comma while others have a colon to conclude the opening line of address

("Dear Allen:" etc.). The Burroughs letters have seven colons and six commas, which looks like a simple matter of inconsistency in his use of epistolary formats. Since both the French and German editions of The Yage Letters standardize the use of the comma, the issue seems to be the appropriateness of editing for internal consistency. Given the heterogeneity of materials and the hybridity of the text overall, such homogenizing might seem a mistaken effort to resolve contradictions and unify dissonant parts into a singular and coherent whole. Equally, we might appeal to authorial practice to question such regularization. In the case of Burroughs' letters, however, a striking fact emerges with exceptional clarity. Up until late 1959 Burroughs never used a colon, but always a comma. After November 1959, he shifted—suddenly and almost completely—from comma to colon. Therefore, the use of the colon in his "June 21 1960" letter appears consistent with his letter-writing, while its use in six of his "1953" letters now appears entirely inconsistent. The implication for any editing intervention seems clear.

However, something else might be involved if a pattern were observable. The six 1953 letters that use colons are the fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, tenth and eleventh letters in the sequence of "In Search of Yage." In short, these were all the letters first published in Big Table. And of course the fact that this issue was published in Summer 1959 (before Burroughs changed his epistolary practice) establishes that the use of the colon in them cannot be attributed to Burroughs (making belated revisions), but must be accounted for by the house style of the magazine's editor, Paul Carroll.

What, then, is the editorial upshot of unraveling this history of the comma and the colon? Should the "1953" colons be replaced by commas to bring the letters correctly into line with the author's practice and to remove the "corruption" of Carroll's editing? Or should the colons be retained for this very reason, since they are material traces carried over from the text's original part-publication, evidence of the determinism of material history at the level of even the smallest bibliographic code? Allowing the contradiction in punctuation to stand across the text of "In Search of Yage" becomes, then, a way to respect internal units of consistency by acknowledging the separate authority of the part-publications. In which case, the new edition would make no change, and it may seem a metaphysical distinction to have arrived at this conclusion by such a long and circuitous path. However, if we take up Tanselle's argument for the "constructed" rather than "emended" text ("editors should not be thinking in terms of altering a particular existing text but of building up a new text, word by word and punctuation mark by punctuation mark, evaluating all available evidence at each step" [71]), then The Yage Letters Redux becomes the first edition to knowingly employ both forms of punctuation, guided by the larger aim to represent the multiple histories and composite agency of the text.

Clearly, there's no need to detail the micro-editing decisions made for Redux, but the descriptive analysis in previous sections should have demonstrated the validity of a practice informed by the full social and bibliographical life of the text in its multiple material histories. To give just the example involving the largest number of interventions; the third edition of 1988 made wholesale changes in accidentals and bibliographical codes, altering most visibly the first edition's layout in twelve out of the fifteen letters. Here, a precise knowledge of the magazine formats establishes the arbitrary nature of these alterations, which are neither internally consistent nor motivated by being grounded in previously published versions (let alone manuscripts). But if the third edition (being the most complete) can still be used as the base text, should the first be used as the copy text in its accidentals? A socialized approach might suggest restoring the formats of the magazines rather than that of the first City Lights edition. This would bring differences in original codes to the foreground, to display rather than conceal the text's multiple material histories. And yet there's a distinction between removing arbitrary homogenizations (as in the punctuation of the French and German editions) and preventing a smooth, consistent reading by crudely maximizing heterogeneity to the extent, for example, of reproducing different typefaces to make visible the historicity and provenance of each part.

In any event, there are practical limits to such variability. What to do about layout features particular to one bibliographical format that cannot be carried over to another, such as the line spacing of letters manipulated to fit page size? Likewise, if social editing suggests a "diplomatic" documentation to reproduce the mimeograph qualities of Burroughs' letter in The Floating Bear, then how justify clear-text elsewhere? Then again, the key practical limits, the most materially determining consequences of the collaborative agency of publication, are those set by the publisher. Although immune to theory, commercial publishers work with the practical contingencies of the world, and it would be ironic and naïve in the extreme for a social text approach to forget it. Take, for example, the label "definitive": discredited in theory as the chimera of positivist philology (for implying an autonomous, timeless text that exists beyond the historical contingencies of its own making), it returns in practice if the publisher has the last say on the title and the sales department wants it on the cover (see my Introduction to Junky: the definitive text of 'Junk'), or if the marketing term seems useful to promote the book on the publisher's website (see <http://www.citylights.com/CLpub4th.html>). And so for The Yage Letters, as a City Lights publication, the challenge remains how best to exploit the rich descriptive and interpretive opportunities of a socialized approach while still retaining the reader-friendly clear-text demanded by the publishing context.

A new edition can advance interpretive criticism by materializing the text's neglected histories of formal, thematic, and bibliographical "space time travel," but as itself part of that historical process not its conclusion. As Eggert acknowledges, "one does one's best. The result is practical, not ideal; useful and usable, not perfect" (334). Burroughs himself knew the "fix" is never final, even if, at the time, that is what he wanted to or did believe, which is surely why he did not include in his text the verdict he reached in July 1953 about the object of his own grail quest: "Yage is it" (Letters 180).

I would like to thank the Arts and Humanities Research Council and Keele University for generously resourcing the leave needed to carry out the research for this essay, and Jim McLaverty for giving supportive feedback.

All editions contained Ginsberg's June 10, 1960 letter in "Seven Years Later" and "To Whom It May Concern" (letter, August 28 1963) in the "Epilogue."

A printing in October 1990 mistakenly identified itself as the 4th edition; in fact, The Yage Letters Reudux is the true 4th edition.

Endnotes

ⁱ Compromising precision for the sake of convenience, I ignore the fact that the definite article in the title was only dropped after the first edition of 1959.

ⁱⁱ On closer inspection, paragraphs Loranger identifies as having been "deleted" from Big Table (105 and 107) were actually moved elsewhere in the Naked Lunch ([New York: Grove, 1966; Black Cat edition] 160).

ⁱⁱⁱ The Olympia edition also had a further two-hundred words that did not appear in later editions.

^{iv} Like many other critics, Loranger confusingly refers to the two dozen separate sections of Naked Lunch—divisions of the text that, inconsistently in the first edition, were given their own titles—as "routines," a term Burroughs only ever applied to self-contained material of up to a few pages in length.

^v Equally, knowledge of the manuscript history would have changed dramatically Loranger's analysis of the genetic relation between material appearing in both Big Table and Naked Lunch: where she sees the texts "developing" from magazine to book—"Burroughs makes extensive revisions of all but two episodes" (8)—in fact, in almost all cases it can be shown that the "revised" material was not new at all, but already written and present in his 1958 "Interzone" manuscript, from which Burroughs had made selections for Big Table designed to avoid American censorship. Although she employs appropriate caveats here ("It is reasonable to assume" [9]), the detailed tables that document her comparative analysis give an impression of more materially-grounded rigour. For example, in table 2, "Revision from Big Table to Naked Lunch," Loranger describes the relationship between "Episode 6" in Big Table and the "Islam Incorporated" section of Naked Lunch, noting "additional material on 147, 148-52 including Sample Menu." Far from being new material written in 1959, all this material was in the 1958 "Interzone" manuscript.

^{vi} Loranger refers only to "cosmetic changes—the numbered episodes in Big Table become unnumbered, titled routines in Naked Lunch" (8).

^{vii} See Frankel.

^{viii} For my terms here, see Young's excellent article. There are signs that the field of Burroughs textual scholarship is starting to expand. Most notably, Davis Schneiderman has produced strong, culturally informed materialist readings in two recent conference papers: "Everybody's Got Something to Hide Except for Me and My Lawsuit: DJ Danger Mouse, William S. Burroughs, and the Politics of EGrey Tuesday" (Collage as Cultural Practice Conference, University of Iowa [March 2005]), and "If I hold a conch shell to my ear, do I owe a royalty to Neptune? Scribbles on the a-history of pla(y)giamism" (Association of Writing Programs Conference, Vancouver, British Columbia [April 2005]).

^{ix} This is a case I have made with reference to the radical errors in bibliographic chronology that led another of Burroughs' otherwise finest critics, Robin Lydenberg, to get backwards the relationship between "early" and "late" texts in her deconstructive analysis of his cut-up novels. See my Secret of Fascination, 244-45.

^x Junkie published in "unexpurgated" form as Junky in 1977; I quote from the re-edited 2003 text; see my introduction for a detailed publishing history.

^{xi} The relation seems especially self-evident in the 1978 German edition, which prints the two books back-to-back so that the last page of Junkie, with the words "Vielleicht ist Yage der endgültige Fix" (206), is followed by the first page of Auf der Suche nach Yage (confusingly using the title of just one section to identify the whole).

^{xii} Although all editions carried a note acknowledging these part-publications, full details were never given, and were given sometimes only to be obscured (e.g., the second edition of 1975 did give full bibliographical details of the "July 10, 1953" letter it now included, but by the eighth printing [February 1978] the information had been reduced to just, "A 1953 letter was in Black Mountain Review No. 7").

^{xiii} The phrase comes from Burroughs' letter to Mel Hardiment, January 23, 1961 (The Ginsberg Circle: Burroughs-Hardiment Collection, Kenneth Spencer Research Library, University of Kansas).

^{xiv} See my "Cutting Up Politics."

^{xv} Ironically, Ginsberg's contribution, his poem "America," actually names Burroughs.

^{xvi} As Ginsberg recalled, this specific text was actually "the seed of Naked Lunch" (Lotringer 807).

^{xvii} For example, the account of a literal trip "across the Pacific in an outrigger canoe to Easter Island" returns the reader to the yagé trip in Macoa (in the "April 15" letter), where a hut seems to take on "an archaic far-Pacific look with Easter Island heads" (44, 24), while the Composite City, where "the untended dead are eaten by vultures in the street," echoes the gross sight in Esmeraldas (in the "May 5" letter) of "vultures eating a dead pig in the main drag" (45, 31).

^{xviii} Indeed, agency and authority are interrogated as a coded joke in the very first line—"Panama clung to our bodies — Probably cut —" (65)—which takes the reader back to the first letter of "In Search of Yage": "I wonder what a Panamanian boy would be like. Probably cut" (4). The repetition of the phrase is at once fully motivated—a precisely contrived pun on the cutting-up of physical and textual bodies, deconstructing their integrity—and yet called into doubt by the very notion of "probability" that governs the production of meaning in the cut-up text. An intertextual analysis of "I Am Dying, Meester?" would also include its extensive overlap with material in the "Where the Awning Flaps" chapter of The Soft Machine (2nd and 3rd editions).

^{xix} Interestingly, at about the same time, Burroughs did make a cut-up version of the whole "July 10, 1953" letter, possibly intended for The Yage Letters.

^{xx} "Tell Allen the piece of Burroughs I suggest for Black Mountain [Review] would be the whole vision of the Yage City" (Selected Letters 586). It seems Ginsberg initially considered offering Creeley another letter as well, as evidenced by a version of his "January 25, 1953" letter headed "2 letters from Bk III of Naked Lunch by Wm. Seward Burroughs (pseud. is William Lee)." (Burroughs Collection, Columbia University). In contrast to the "July 10, 1953" letter, this one is clearly part of an ongoing epistolary narrative.

^{xxi} Letter, Burroughs to Rosenthal, May 17, 1958 (The Chicago Review Papers, University of Chicago).

^{xxii} Letter, Burroughs to Carroll, November 14, 1959 (Paul Carroll Papers, Series 2, University of Chicago).

^{xxiii} Unlike Ansen's essay, Bowles's was not commissioned by Big Table, and was, in fact, originally written as a letter to the poet John Montgomery.

^{xxiv} Letter, Ginsberg to Ferlinghetti, September 19, 1962 (City Lights Records 1955-1970, Correspondence Files, University of California, Berkeley) [hereafter CLR, UCB].

^{xxv} There is also an indirect context, since, before the cut-up text, there appears an undated letter from "Roi" (Jones) to "Diane" (Di Prima), in which he advances his understanding of Floating Bear as, precisely, "letters."

^{xxvi} "Re ROUTINE, you were not very happy about it yourself, especially the name Roosevelt, and we had already discussed some possible modifications from your own point of view before they [Scorpion, who refused to print the text] came along." Letter, Sankey to Ferlinghetti, October 8, 1963 (CLR, UCB).

^{xxvii} Letter, Ginsberg to Kerouac, October 9, 1957 (Miles Collection, Columbia University).

^{xxviii} Letter, Ginsberg to Cowley, December 10, 1953 (Miles Collection, Columbia University).

^{xxix} Letter, Ginsberg to Ferlinghetti, February 1963 (CLR, UCB).

^{xxx} The internal evidence shows the presence in the City Lights text of numerous transcription errors carried over from the magazine publications. In the City Lights Editorial Files, together with proofs and long galleys, Carton 1 contains the relevant pages cut from Big Table 2 and Kulchur 3, marked up with instructions (e.g., "Printer: Begin here") (CLR, UCB).

^{xxxi} "Have you thought again of printing Burroughs's collected So American letters - they're all available in Big Table, Kulchur + Floating Bear — It would make a nice small prose book + it's all there in print now." Letter, Ginsberg to Ferlinghetti, June 26, 1962 (CLR, UCB). Italics mine.

^{xxxii} The "July 20" letter contained the same material later used for the Epilogue to Queer.

^{xxxiv} Letter, Sankey to Ferlinghetti, October 16, 1963 (CLR, UCB).
